Introduction

The cities of Kokand, Namangan, Andijan, Margilan, Osh in the 70 – ies of the XVIII-XIX century were the major economic centers of the Fergana Valley. The main occupation of the population living in the cities of the Fergana Valley consisted of crafting, trading, in part farming and gardening.

One of the main occupations of the inhabitants of the cities of the Fergana Valley was silk weaving, and silk and silk fabrics were one of the main products of the country's foreign trade. At the end of the 60-ies of the XIX century, about nine hundred households in the Kokand and Margilan themselves were engaged in silk weaving, each family had a weaving loom from 1 to 3 soles. 2-3 members of the family were engaged in the same business and each family prepared from two packs of silk [1] to five packs a week [2]. According to approximate calculations, the annual amount of silk produced in cocaine and Margilan was equal to 5560 pud [3].

Silk made in the Fergana Valley was of much higher quality, and the markets of the country were famous for its raw silk and silk fabrics. Depending on the quality of silk made by the Craftsmen of the Fergana Valley – it is divided into “chilla”, “tafil”, “sarnak” and other varieties. The silk crop is also harvested and the coil is also prepared. The highest quality coil in the Fergana Valley is considered to be "namangan" [5].

From silk, various fabrics are woven. Craftsmen of Kokand, Margilan, Namangan and Khujand silk fabrics (kanoviz, silk, satin, etc.the G.), those who produced semi-silk fabrics (beqasam, banoras, adras). The sale of silk and silk fabrics in Margilan, which is located in one of the largest markets of the Fergana Valley, was carried out intensively throughout the year. The XVIII century was in the Fergana Valley in the 70-ies F.Efremov wrote in his memoirs about the preparation of silk fabrics: “in the center of the Margilan market is a large round stone column, with a height of 40 Sajen [6], the thickness of which is equal to 2.5 sajen, and various fabrics are woven here” [7]. 1813-1814 year F.Nazarov, who was in the Margilan, “....in the city there are different factories, in which they prepare Persian scraps, bakhmals and various Asian drapes. They sell them to Bukhari and Qashgar” [8], – he wrote. Also V.Velyaminov – Zernov, in the of the Kokand-Kuhkara and Qashqar markets to be rated in price [17].

Silk and semi-silk fabrics made in the Fergana Valley were popular in the Kokand Khanate, where the quality of the silk was recognized. The silk was known for its fine-threaded quality, especially in Bukhara and Samarkand. The variety of silk made in the Kokand Khanate, called "chilla," was popular in Eastern countries, especially in India [24].

In 1867 year, 1000 camels of Kokand and Bukhara Khanate were sent to India with silk, and its weight was on average around 12 thousand pounds. A large part of the Silk was turned into a finished product in the Multon, and a part was sent to Bombay. In Bombay, silk trade is effective, and this port through the city Kokand silk was also taken to European countries.

From the Kokand Khanate to India through Bukhara and Kabul, a strip of tin, in particular, a tin of Namangan, was also brought. In the 70-ies of the XIX century, one of its pods was sold for cash up to 129 rubles, 6 months to debt 133 rubles [25].

The main product of the Kokand Khanate that exports to Afghanistan is silk. A large part of the silk, which was brought to the cities of Afghanistan, was purchased by local craftsmen, while a large part was taken to the countries of the army. According to European tourists who were in India, in the 50-ies of the XIX century, a high-grade "Kokand silk" was brought from Herat to Shikorpur, and in Kabul even the most high-quality silk was known under the name "Kokand silk". The Kokand silk presented to Kabul is sorted here, separated into different varieties and sent to Punjab and India [26].

Silk and semi-silk fabrics from the Khanate were also considered in demand in Afghanistan itself. In particular, the craftsmen of the city of Khulm (Tashkurgan), where sewing was developed, used the silk fabrics of Kokand in the creation of their products. The silk, which brought silk fabrics in Khulma, was able to meet merchants more often [27].

From the Kokand Khanate to Iran, mainly raw silk, silk finishing and semi-silk finishing were carried out. In 1870 year from Bukhara to Iran was sent 23 thousand poonds, that is, 2 million 120 thousand rubles of silk, and part of this silk was taken from the Kokand Khanate [28].

Silk and semi-silk fabrics, products made by local craftsmen and Chinese goods were brought from the Kokand Khanate to the cities of the Arab countries and the Usmoniyits state. The pilgrims, who were thrown to visit Mecca and Medina every year during the Hajj season, also played an important role in the implementation of trade relations between the two regions. In particular, it was in Central Asia in the 60-ies of the XIX century according to A.Vamberi, to Hirat was accompanied by “about 50-60 people of cocaine pilgrims who took him to Arabia to sell almost 40 dzhina [29] silk kerchiefs, about 2 thousand knives, 30 pieces of namangan silk, a large number of Kokand detainees and other goods” [30].

Part of the Valley pilgrims who are going to visit Mecca are those who prefer to use the route through Russia, namely Orenburg – Astrakhan – Istanbul. They carried local goods with them during the process of pilgrimage, as well as transferred to foreign goods during the journey. According to the Tashkent customs office, in June 1871 from Kokand to Mecca and Medina through Tashkent 400 pieces of silk kerchief [31], in May-August 1872 to Mecca 23 thousand 545 rub. 50 kop. goods shipped [32].

Famous Margilan silk fabrics, handkerchiefs, blankets and other Kokand Khanate products have their own buyers in the Turkish markets and are carried out by many Khanate merchants [33]. In particular, according to the Tashkent customs office, in April 1871, Andijan merchants Bobonazar Sohfi Chinibekov and Haji Habibullo Mulla Heydarbekovs through Russian cities sent to Istanbul for 24 rubles 40 pieces of silk kerchief, 40 rubles 600 pieces of chit, 40 rubles 8 pounds of raw silk, total: 104 rubles, Andijan merchants Haji Muhammad Amin Hodja Abdullo Hajiev 40 rubles 8 pounds of raw silk, 138 rubles 180 pieces of silk kerchief, 90 rubles 180 pieces of simple kerchief, 30 rubles 10 pairs of beqasam, 40 rubles 10 pairs of canaus, total: 308 rubles, Kokand merchant Mulla Nematulla Mulla Abdurahmonov received 138 rubles of 180 pieces of silk scarf, 140 rubles of 280 pieces of simple scarf, 42 rubles of silk cloth, total: 320 rubles, Andijan merchant Khodamonbekov received 400 pieces of 200 rubles of silk scarf, 300 rubles of 1 pood 20 pounds of raw silk, total 500 rubles of goods [34].

Also, in May of 1871, through the cities of Tashkent and Russia, to Istanbul Kokand merchant Muhammad Yakub 148 rubles 300 pieces of silk scarf, 8 rubles 4 poood duriya silk cloth, 400 rubles 2 poood tefil silk, total: 566 rubles, Kokand merchant Mulla Yuldosh Mulla Kurbasheva 160 rubles 320 pieces of silk scarf, Kokand merchant Haji Muhammad Nurboribayev 20 rubles kanaus and 137 rubles 140 pieces of silk kerchief, total: 160 rubles, Kokand merchant Mulla Muhammad Musa Kaganboev 20 rubles 10 pairs of canaus and 137 rubles 140 pieces of silk kerchief, total: 160 rubles took goods [35].

In conclusion, it can be noted that in the 70 – ies of the XVIII-XIX century, one of the main occupations of the inhabitants of the Fergana Valley was silk production, silk and silk fabrics were considered one of the main products of domestic and foreign trade of the country. However, these products were made on the basis of manual labor and, in most cases, their quality was not at the required level, they lost the ability to compete with the penetration of English and Russian goods into the markets of Central Asia from the beginning of the XIX century. As a result, the Kokand Khanate also began to grow into one of the countries that produces raw materials, like other Central Asian khanates.
